

One-minute market update – Summer 2017

Economy

- The economic uptick that began in the summer of 2016 has continued to grow and a synchronized global economic expansion underway, with leading indicators pointing to a faster-than-normal clip across much of the world.
- We budget for a bit more economic growth over the next few years than was achieved over the past several, and the downside risks to our outlook – threat of protectionism, an aging business cycle and precarious international relations – appear manageable.
- There are still plenty of reasons why the sustainable growth rate is notably lower than it was a decade or two ago, and these are rooted in deteriorating demographics and a changing economic structure.

Fixed Income

- Central banks are leaning toward tighter, if less accommodative, monetary policies in response to improving economic conditions.
- The Fed is again setting the pace with a handful of rate increases already delivered, and more on offer. China has also been raising rates and other major central banks are considering the next steps for dialing back stimulus.
- We expect the long-term direction for bond yields is higher and our models confirm this view. But receding enthusiasm about Trump’s policies has weighed on yields, reintroducing the fixed-income valuation risk that had been alleviated shortly after the election.

Equity Markets

- Global equities have reached new highs and valuations may no longer be a driving force for stocks, at least in the U.S.
- Fortunately, U.S. profits have recovered from their two-year swoon and, if earnings continue to rise as analysts expect, the total-return potential for stocks remains quite positive.
- We trimmed our equity overweight by one percentage point due to the aging business cycle, less compelling valuations and concern that complacency is beginning to seep into markets.
